Jing Laoshi, besides speaking multiple languages with native fluency, is the principal investigator and director for the UO chapter of the Chinese Flagship Program. Because it is a grant based program, she directly manages the federal grant, coupled with extensive program director responsibilities, such as managing personnel, curriculum, student advising, and teacher training. She is a part of all aspects that are central to the operation of the program. Currently, she is researching linguistic theories and sociolinguistics. Her research is focusing on the relationship between language and society, grammar, human cognition-emotion and second language learning. Her tip for anyone learning a language: “language learning is a frequency based process. The more you receive input the more you produce output and the faster you will learn. At the same time the input and the output must also be tied to purposes, which is what we do in all preparatory Flagship classes.”

According to Jing laoshi, what makes the Flagship so successful and what it takes to succeed is a good balance between high expectations and strong motivation. From the student side, motivation comes from having the high expectations and having adequate support in order to realize those expectations. You can not only have high expectations without help to reach that goal. Instead, Flagship inclusively creates opportunities and affords support for students through tutors and actively engaging learning environments. Besides motivating students to reach their goals, there has to be accountability at all levels; students, teacher, directors, the university and the tutors all must be held accountable and make this a collective endeavor in order to maximize everyone’s potential.

Heaven’s way is to reward those who are diligent. The Chinese understanding of heaven is the principle set of laws that bind our world. It is true that hard work pays off, especially language learning in particular. When people look back on their career they see the fruits of their labor from when they were younger or in college, particularly where there are periods of setbacks, and evidence against their success.
Fengjun Mao acquired bachelor’s and master’s degrees both in the related fields of Chinese language pedagogy and applied linguistics. She has significant teaching experience at ECNU (East China Normal University) working at the School of International Studies, and later at University of Michigan Chinese language program. With this experience, the progression into a position in the East Asian Languages and Literatures Department as a language instructor was natural. Because the Chinese Flagship Program is a very prestigious, highly competitive and selective program, Mao Laoshi knows that our students are generally highly engaged, self-disciplined and have a strong motivation for attaining professional level proficiency. Developing language skills, as well as incorporating the cultural aspects is what makes the Flagship Program so successful. For students, Mao recommends taking literary Chinese courses. While not a living language, the reading includes selections of ancient Chinese literature such as Confucius and Lao Tse, which permits students a deeper understanding of Chinese culture. Her advice for reading Lao Tse is to be familiar with the philosophy of 無為 (wú wéi), which means “effortless effort” or “action without action”, the profound idea that taking no action can be the biggest action you can take.
On the first day of Chinese 101, unsure of what the language or class will hold, the last things students would suspect is 黄老师 (Huang Laoshi). Born in Gaoshan, Taiwan and then moving to Taipei, Huang Laoshi came to America to study Chinese Literature. She began teaching as a graduate student, which turned into a 20-year long career as a language instructor.

She mostly teaches First Year Chinese, her favorite level. Her favorite part to teach is the grammar, which she teaches out of the textbook she wrote herself. In the future, Huang Laoshi would like to work with the upper-level teachers to create textbooks for second and third year Chinese as well. Her class teaches not only the basic words, characters, and grammar structures but also engages students with pop culture references and animated discussions. Some days, she even shows up in full cosplay of her favorite anime characters. As she put it: “Come to my class, then you will know me too well.”

Huang Laoshi’s Tip for Learning Chinese:
Find your own motivation, whatever it may be. If you have your own personal motivation for learning the language and culture and invest in making friends and connections in that language, it will improve your level more than any time in class ever could.

Monica’s office is on the fourth floor of Friendly Hall. It is a bit of a hike, but worth it for the help and advice she gives to all Flagship students. Monica’s passion for China started at New York University where she was studying Journalism. One of her friends, a Chinese artist, encouraged Monica to go to China, where she taught English in schools around China, mostly in Guangzhou. Through a love of poetry, Monica applied for graduate school at the University of Oregon, where she completed her doctorate in Comparative Literature. She stayed at the university with a visiting professor position, teaching upper division literature and classical Chinese classes. From there, she became the Flagship Coordinator and has worked hard to help students achieve their language and personal goals ever since.

Now, Monica is collaborating with other teachers to edit a handbook of Chinese language teaching and does various translation work as well as writing articles on top of supporting the Flagship Program at UO. Although she misses the dimsum, tea drinking and celebrating Lunar New Year across different towns in China, Monica loves interacting with students at the University of Oregon. She also loves using her background in Classical Chinese to help students with homework or assignments and encourages students to stop by anytime for help or advice.

Seoul, South Korea: At 6:00 am, Kim Jinsu is attending language classes at a Language Learning Institute. From 9:00 am to late in the night, he is working on his master’s degree.

The amount of work required for a master’s degree did not deter him from his passion to learn languages, however, and every morning he woke up early to achieve his goals. Now, he can speak English, Korean, Japanese, and Chinese, and can read German and French.

His interest in Chinese began in high school, where he was drawn to the beauty of Chinese characters. The “China Boom” in Korea in the early 2000’s offered him a chance to major in Chinese Literature. Learning languages was a way for Kim to broaden his view of the world. “Every time I learn a new language,” he said, “I feel another personality being overlaid on who I was before.”

Now, Kim Jinsu, or 金老师, teaches East Asian languages at the University of Oregon. He is also studying pre-modern Chinese Literature (from Ming Dynasty to Qing Dynasty). He teaches Chinese, Korean, and in the future plans on teaching Japanese and Chinese Literature classes.

Teaching is not without its struggles though, and Kim’s biggest struggle in teaching first-year Chinese was creating the content for his classes. He uses pictures to help students learn vocabulary and worked hard to provide the best feedback.

Despite the challenges, teaching First-year Chinese is a unique experience for Kim. He enjoys seeing the openness of first-year students and the lack of emotional barriers in communication, a trait he emphasizes a great deal. At the end of each term, the most important thing he teaches his students is that it is not a matter of language skill alone, but rather knowing a foreign language allows people to communicate with others in a deeper way.

“Language serves as a window to another world,” He explained, “first I had a window to America than another one for China and then another for Japan and France.” The window is not just a literary window, through language alone, but an emotional one as well.

For Kim, language learning is also a process of self-transformation. It might be tedious to learn every single word, he said, “(but) even though one word is small, two words, ten words, 100 words; it changes you.”
The great outdoors is one of the main reasons that Will Werts decided to attend the University of Oregon: Kayaking, climbing, skiing and biking are all a regular part of Will’s incredibly active sports life. Will Werts is also a member of delta tau delta, he regularly attends international student association gatherings and is an aspiring photographer. With this innate thirst for adventure, learning Chinese and studying a year abroad seemed like just another challenge. With his closest friend Adam, he exclusively speaks Chinese, using Chinglish (Chinese and English) whenever he can’t find a word, which rapidly increases his ability to speak. 有山有水, a saying that describes a beautiful place as having both mountains and water, remains Will’s personal ideal. “I’ve always liked the mountains a lot,” he said, “I do different outdoor recreation activities at least a couple times a week, such as climbing hiking and mountaineering exploring...I hope to bring that mindset to China as well.”
Every year, Flagship goes on a retreat—The weekend is spent playing games, learning from each other, building companionships and most importantly—Eating!
WINTER DINNER
December 2017
To beat the winter blues - we went to a local Chinese restaurant for dinner and bonding.

PORTLAND TRIP
March 2018
• Dim Sum
• Lan Su Garden
• Chinese Festival
Originally from Hawaii, Anna studied middle and high school in an international school in Japan. She is fluent in English and Japanese, and since winter term is a member of the Chinese Flagship. She joined multiple cultural organizations and is also on the Japanese student organization executive board. Her personal favorite when it comes to Flagship classes is the Chinese literature class because it combines history and people, and explains how literature was affected by and to this day still affects the history and government of China. Because of her knowledge of Japanese, it was fairly easy to read the language. While in high school in Japan, she took calligraphy classes which helps her write in Chinese. This summer Anna has Princeton in Beijing to look forward to, a very competitive program. “I’m very excited for the food,” she said, “but also to see the culture first hand. I enjoy traveling and I’ve always been really curious about what kind of place China is.”
Emily attended Lincoln High School in Portland. She was recruited for the Flagship Program in High School when representatives from the University of Oregon came to the high school and handed out flyers advocating for the merit of the program. The most helpful part of the Flagship for her is the tutoring because reading was never really her strength and her tutor is really good at assigning homework and helping her do the readings. Even though Spring term she did not take any Chinese classes, she still studied how to read and engage with materials. The Capstone year abroad is the main reason why Emily decided to participate in the Flagship, “Just getting to immerse yourself in the culture in China and take classes there, be on your own while discovering a new surrounding, combined with a research opportunity in a field I find interesting just sounds amazing to me,” she said. The Portland trip in Winter term is Emily’s most fond memory of the Flagship so far. “Getting to know people with interests aligned to yours, and the whole point of the retreat is to make friends and get to know people and I feel like I succeeded in that.” She said, “Admittedly the dim sum, lion dancing, and the boba were also amazing.”

Adam is from Portland where he was has been in full immersion schools since elementary school. He is also part of the Wushu club, and regularly demonstrates his skill set at Asian Cultural events with the Asian and Pacific American Student Union (APASU). His most fond experience in Flagship so far was the beach retreat, where he met a lot of new people, got more in sync with the program, and formed relationships with like-minded peers. Flagship also enabled him to make friends with foreign exchange students faster. It allowed for more meaningful friendships, and critical communication skills combined with a firm grasp of contemporary culture. His favorite Chinese saying expertly reflects his attitude towards learning: 早死早超生 literally translates to the earlier you die the earlier you reincarnate. It means that sometimes when something is hard, just go for it because that’s how you get it over with.
